The present invention is a method for the purification of organic contaminants, including tetrachloroethylene (PCE), trichloroethylene (TCE), carbon tetrachloride (CCL4), vinyl chloride (VC), dioxane, and various organic solvents contained in, or leaking from, industrial waste processing equipment, storage tanks, and pipelines. The present invention is also a method for removing contaminants contained in industrial waste water that may be treated in a municipal treatment plant. Organic contaminants are commonly found in the water used for industrial waste processing and, in many instances, in industrial waste water emanating from waste processing systems. These contaminants include halogenated hydrocarbons (PCE, TCE, and chloroform) and other organic chemicals (e.g., benzene, toluene, and ethylbenzene). Organic contaminants are also found in storage tanks and pipelines. The contamination of industrial waste water and storage tanks can occur, for example, as a result of inadvertent spills, byproducts released from industrial processes, and leakage from pipelines. Organic contaminants are often highly toxic and pose a major threat to health and the environment. A variety of technologies for the removal of organic contaminants from industrial waste water have been developed. These technologies include air stripping, biodegradation, biological treatment and filtration. At the present time, mechanical stripping is the most widely used method for removing organic contaminants from industrial waste water. A very effective mechanical stripping method for removing organic contaminants from industrial waste water involves exposing contaminated water to low pressure steam at temperatures of about 200xc2x0 C. This method is referred to as steam stripping. Steam stripping is usually employed to remove volatile contaminants from contaminated water. In this method, contaminated water enters a steam stripping tower. As contaminated water traverses through the tower, the water is heated under vacuum conditions to a temperature of about 200xc2x0 C., and then it is exposed to steam. Organic contaminants are vaporized and entrained in the steam. The steam stripping tower includes a series of tubes through which contaminated water is routed in a countercurrent flow relationship with steam. At the end of the steam stripping tower, the now-cleaned water exits the tower, and it is carried off to another location for further processing. While the steam stripping method is effective for removing volatile contaminants, steam stripping has several disadvantages. First, the process is slow because the contaminated water must be exposed to low pressure steam for a period
