I'm making a simple game using JavaScript and I am trying to make a functional formula to find out if a number is positive or negative. This is what I have now: if (Math.sign(-4) === -1) { // is negative } Does anyone know a better way to do this? A: You can use Math.abs() to get the absolute value of a number. Since Math.sign() only accepts a number as a parameter, -1 is considered a negative number by JavaScript: if (Math.abs(-4) === 4) { // is positive } What's in a Widget? (1996) [pdf] - kposehn === sandGorgon The real interesting question is what is a disruptive innovation that helps a computer be so much more than a programmable calculator. This was the question for the PC in the 1970s. Things like webcam, fingerprint, phone, car and elevator are all disruptive. I guess one could argue the smart fridge, thermostat, electric car etc are all "more than" just programmable machines. You can imagine a far more complex functions that are standardized and can be plugged-in everywhere. I've been toying with the idea of building a smart signal booster. Should a man-in-the-middle attack from a foreign provider or an ISP exist, then it would just serve the entire home - 4G-5G, GSM, CDMA - at once (just
