A: Is it possible to filter out all PDF, DOC, and DOCX files from the search? That would be a much easier solution than having to parse the results of the search for the attribute "PDF".

Nursing students' experience of a clinical orientation in a psychiatric setting: a review of the literature. To identify the current knowledge regarding the experiences of undergraduate students admitted to a psychiatry setting in the context of a clinical orientation, with particular focus on those aspects that could help to prepare them as nurses. The purpose of the clinical orientation is to introduce the students to the setting and the staff, and to provide the students with an opportunity for them to learn technical skills, and generally to develop teamwork skills. A scoping review was conducted using the stages suggested in Arksey and O'Malley and Levac et al. to review the literature. Using the scoping review approach as a method provided a robust and systematic approach to reviewing the literature, which enabled clear identification of the research gaps and weaknesses in the existing evidence. The in-depth and systematic review highlighted a lack of research about the experiences of the undergraduate students during the time of their clinical orientation. An interesting area to explore would be to review the student experiences immediately before and after their clinical placement to see if their experiences change during their time in the in-patient setting. The gap in the literature needs to be addressed to ensure that undergraduate students receive a broad education prior to their in-patient placement, and that their learning experience is safe and structured to provide them with an appropriate level of skill, knowledge and confidence. Time-dependent changes of respiratory mechanics in mechanically ventilated patients with inflammatory and non-inflammatory injury to the lung. mechanically ventilated patients with different types of lung injury, little is known about the time-dependent changes in respiratory mechanics that occur in patients with inflammatory and non-inflammatory lung injury. We hypothesized that time-dependent changes in respiratory mechanics occur in patients with lung injury who are mechanically ventilated. The study included 28 mechanically ventilated patients with lung injury who had normal chest radiography and were treated with low tidal volume, conventional positive end-expiratory pressure, and appropriate fluid balance management. The study was conducted in a cohort of patients who were followed up for 4 days, 2 weeks, and 6 weeks, respectively. Functional residual capacity was measured at 0,
