A: Here is the list of the current device IDs, as per this MSDN article: device id , not settling there, "we shouldn't be rolling over". Obama's latest positions on outsourcing, on the arms treaty and on "signature" legislation (such as healthcare) have turned the Democratic Party into the party of big business. And the result of that is that the Democratic candidates are now campaigning on the platform that what the Democrats do is not what the Republicans do, and that they are the party for the middle class. This means (and I realize that it's not even remotely an original idea, but I'm still trying to figure it out) that those who only look at the record in the mainstream press, who believe that neither the Republicans nor the Democrats have any substance, and only go after the one who has the most outrageous statements, are the ones who will finally conclude that this whole thing is a circus act, that they've been fooled. Ultimately, the Democrats can always be thrown back on their record of fighting against big business. The best defense against the Republican accusation that the Democrats are the party of special interest is to say "yes, we are". If all three political parties are "pay to play", then I'm not willing to say that the Republican candidates are "the less corrupt", because the Democrats are a whole lot worse. I have to think that, that's the best they can do, and that even if they don't admit to it, there is some sort of tacit admission (because they have not used the accusation, but they are still trying to position themselves as the reasonable ones who don't see things from the left). So, no, I don't think Obama should change his mind on this. I think if he's willing to come out in a campaign that says that all of us must be held accountable for our actions, that all of us have to serve the interests of the people we represent, then he should keep his promises and his promises, and he c6a93da74d
